

Condé Nast Traveller

TRUTH IN TRAVEL

DECEMBER 2002 £3.20

20 Journeys
of a lifetime

Venice

Christmas on the Grand Canal

Boutique hotels

India's stylish new treasures

Vietnam

From Saigon to the Perfume River

PLUS

Bargain breaks for European shoppers

Brave the world's most exhilarating ski run

• An art lover's guide to Brittany • On location with John Malkovich • Madrid after dark

WITH the Alps overcrowded and the North American ski market 'mature', Asia is gearing up to become the boom destination for skiers in the 21st century. Resorts are opening up in a dozen Asian countries; but for Europeans the most exciting and immediately accessible development is a new heli-skiing operation in Nepal. For the first time the spectacular Himalayan kingdom has granted a licence for heli-skiing, creating almost limitless opportunities for skiers and boarders to make first descents of the mountains – and choose names for the runs afterwards.

Each and every first descent will be recorded by Himalayan Heli Ski Guides, the company operating the new venture, on a map that will show the runs, name them and give an account of the first descent. In addition, every skier or boarder involved will be given a certificate stating the date and time of the descent – and of course the vertical drop and gradient of the run.

Craig Calonica, director of Himalayan Heli Ski Guides, enthuses about heli-skiing 'entering a new dimension. We're talking about skiing in

SKIING OUT OF THE SKIES

Helicopters are opening up descents in Nepal's Himalayas, and 300 resorts are planned in China: Asian skiing is spreading high and wide. Except in Japan, where it is going downhill fast. Patrick Thorne reports the biggest, highest and most outrageous mountain range in the world. This is pure adventure.' Calonica, a former US ski racer now based in Chamonix, has climbed and skied in Nepal for 22 years and made several attempts to ski down Mount Everest. Assisting him will be a group of experienced US and European ski guides.

The helicopter trips will go into areas offering descents suitable for skiers of different skill-levels, ranging from effortless powder fields through

'We're talking about skiing the biggest, highest mountain range in the world'

moderate and advanced slopes to extreme terrain. This winter, the company will concentrate on the Annapurna region, plus terrain either around the base of Mount Everest or in the less well-known Dolpo area near Tibet. The final decision will depend on snow conditions when the season begins in mid-January; but the Dolpo area near Tibet has one of the best snow records in Nepal plus the added interest of the local Tibetan influence.

Himalayan Heli Ski Guides is marketing the holidays more at skiers looking for a 'trip of a lifetime' adventure than those intent on clocking up as many long descents as possible. But the 'vertical' figures are impressive: spread over six runs, 12,000 metres per day should be possible when the weather is clear.

The company has chosen the Yak & Yeti hotel in Kathmandu as its base, but for guests who would prefer to rough it in a tent, there will be a base camp set up in each ski area, staffed by sherpas. In late October prices had not been finalised but a week's skiing as part of a group will probably cost £3,500 or more, without flights to Nepal.

Other Asian countries are also hoping to cash in on skiing. China, which put in a bid for the 2010 Winter Olympics but was knocked out in the first round, aims to open 300 ski areas by the end of the decade. And the Thai tourist destination of Chiang Mai has been earmarked by Burma's >

➤ tourist officials as the 'gateway city' to a new ski resort. Chiang Mai is two hours by air from the remote Kachin province of Burma, where a ski area is located near the Chinese border on the 5,880-metre Mount Hkakabo Razi, which has year-round snow cover.

The proposed development does face a few problems, however. It currently takes 10 days to reach the ski area from Kachin's state capital, Putao, on foot and a local separatist group has made the region unstable. Centuries of distrust between Burma and Thailand still provoke several border confrontations every year, often resulting in fatalities.

Curiously, there is one part of Asia where a boom in winter

Helicopter drops will be in areas to suit skiers of varying abilities sports is not expected. Japan, a major skiing nation for almost a century, has seen a steep decline over the past decade. Hundreds of ski areas have closed. So, too, in September, did the world's biggest snowdome, an indoor ski-area built 10 storeys high in Tokyo on earthquake-proof supports – because of fears of an indoor avalanche. ①

Himalayan Heli Ski Guides (himalheli@easyconnect.fr). Despite Maoist violence in Nepal, the Foreign Office was not advising against travel to the country at the time of going to press.

